Action observation, action understanding, and sports performance: comparison between ballet and basketball players. The purpose of this study was to compare the effectiveness of two training programs designed to increase sports-specific motor adaptations in ballet and basketball players were randomly allocated to an experimental (EB) or a control (CB) groups. The EB group trained with an action observation, action understanding and motor learning (AOML) approach for 2 hours per day over 8 weeks. The CB group followed a progressive strengthening program for 6 weeks. The Performance-based aspects of motor skills at baseline, immediately after training and at 3-month follow-up. Both groups showed significant improvements in performance-based aspects of motor skills at post-test and at 3-month follow-up. There was a significant main effect of group but no interaction between group and time. Both training approaches are effective for improving performance-based aspects of motor skills in young competitive athletes. However, the strength gains of
