"It's not like we're never going to regulate water in this state. It's just too big to ignore." South Florida Water Management District Director Robert Rudder said he's been fascinated by Groundwater Act litigation since he first heard about it in his job two decades ago as an attorney in the Palm Beach County government. "It's about as comprehensive a groundwater regulatory statute as you could ask for," Rudder said. Palm Beach County Water Management District officials have been working to develop a unified set of regulations that will control what people and businesses can and can't do with groundwater. But the county has been part of the ongoing legal battles of the past few decades. The district must establish rules for any activities that extract water from the aquifer and allow people and businesses to do the same, but it also must monitor the environment to see if anything is happening harmful to humans. There are also rules about how to keep water use in balance with the sustainable flow of groundwater. Officials said they have taken a holistic approach, considering things like the size of aquifers and the proximity of wells, groundwater conservation and the need to sustainably use water, and the impact on the environment. It's clear that the Groundwater Act has a lot of outside influence. In 1997, the state of Florida determined that wells in Broward, Miami-Dade and Palm Beach counties were extracting and selling water that wasn't part of the recharge zone for the aquifer that serves the area. The Groundwater Act has been around for two decades, but the state only recently issued permits for well-users to sell water, becoming the first state with active sales of groundwater in Florida. 0cc13bf012
