Development The development of the FIFA series began with the original FIFA in 1991, when the game was first published by Electronic Arts, which was released in North America on the Master System, Sega Genesis and Game Gear. In June 1992, Electronic Arts published FIFA in Europe. At the time of the game's first release in the United States it was written off as a flop, and was not a hit with the American public. EA had difficulty convincing the game's publisher, Infogrames, to release it on PlayStation in the U.S. but eventually did so in the U.S. in September of the same year. In the United Kingdom, it was the cover of issue four of Official PlayStation magazine at Christmas 1992. In the week of its release, it sold 50,000 copies, but in subsequent weeks it became one of the best selling games of the year and was given favourable reviews by the magazines such as Maximum and Edge. For FIFA 2001 the game made significant changes such as increasing the animation quality to match Hollywood movies of the time, adding new players with improved AI and adding a new control system and play through. The game received favourable reviews, including IGN's 15th best game of 2001. The game was released as the flagship title for the new PlayStation 2 console and was the highest-selling videogame title in the United Kingdom of the following year. It was also the first of the series to be released on DVD. FIFA 2002 was released for Windows in the United States on November 5, 2000. In the United Kingdom it was released as part of the Home & Leisure section of the PlayStation Store. The game was as well received as its predecessor, earning favourable reviews across the majority of major video game publications. It was the best-selling sports game of the year. It also introduced significant changes such as better graphics and sounds, and the introduction of the UEFA Champions League. It was reported on 11 March 2008 that many external assets and job titles for development on the next FIFA game were to be temporarily suspended. On 26 October 2008, EA Sports announced that the football simulation
