The non-alkaloid fractions of Manilkara zapota, belonging to Sapotaceae family, are a great source of secondary metabolites (flavonoids and saponins), which have been described as inhibitors of a variety of cellular targets. Here, we describe the effects of extracts from leaves of M. zapota on skin and liver tissue from an established model of chemical carcinogenesis induced in SKH1 mice. The studies were carried out with extracts of M. zapota administered orally before or after the challenge with the carcinogen 7,12-dimethylbenz[a]anthracene (DMBA). Exploring the experience of living with chronic fatigue syndrome. Chronic fatigue syndrome (CFS) is a debilitating disease often characterized by disabling, unexplained, persistent fatigue and other symptoms. We sought to better understand the symptoms of CFS and experiences of living with the disease by using formal grounded theory. Focus groups of individuals with CFS and cognitive interviews were conducted. Participants described a persistent sense of exhaustion, mind-body disconnection, and functional limitations. Some described physical problems and emotional burdens as contributors to their sense of fatigue. The rheumatology team had the best knowledge about CFS and was considered a major source of information. CFS appeared to be conceptualized by participants as an emotional and cognitive state. Health care providers should explore the emotional experience of living with CFS and assess for symptoms of depression.
