While the future of the Twilight Zone remake may still be up in the air, there's been word that the series may have taken some liberties with its iconic original story. Loading Loading A story reported by The Wrap has revealed that while the new series has employed the likes of Gillian Anderson, John Cho, and John Lithgow, the remake has been told using a new timeline from the very start, potentially forking the universe at the conclusion of the series. In essence, the reboot's story will be told with a slightly altered timeline when it premieres on CBS this fall."The reason we're doing the show is because we thought the original series was very, very cool and we wanted to get that back," series star Zachary Quinto told The Wrap. "We also wanted to carry the legacy forward. It has never been done on television before so it felt like a really cool and ambitious project and [CBS] was really excited about it. They've got that series that was so groundbreaking and had so much craft to it and so we really wanted to go into that world. We also wanted to tell new stories about these characters that are connected to that series."In terms of the timeline change, the remake is supposedly taking place at a time when the original Twilight Zone ran on television from 1959 to 1964. It's not clear how much the timeline changes, but it appears to be more of a loose attempt at a reboot than a major shift.Twilight Zone producers Steven Spielberg and original series creator Rod Serling's son and granddaughter, Ethan and Sarah Serling, have yet to comment on the new reports. The team is currently in talks 2edc1e01e8
